Evergreen Landscape Pros Expands Coyote Fence Services

SANTA FE, NM - June 16, 2026 -
Landscaping firm broadens regional fence installation to include latilla, cedar, and stone options across northern New Mexico communities.

Evergreen Landscape Pros, a landscaping company headquartered in Santa Fe, New Mexico, announced the expansion of its coyote fence installation division to serve homeowners and commercial properties across more than 10 communities in northern New Mexico. The company now offers coyote, latilla, cedar, and stone fencing as part of a broader effort to meet growing demand for traditional Southwestern boundary solutions.

The expansion addresses a sustained increase in interest in fence styles that are native to the region's architectural identity. Coyote fence installation has gained particular traction among property owners who want functional perimeter security without departing from the adobe and earth-tone aesthetic that defines the area's built environment. Evergreen Landscape Pros currently serves communities including Eldorado, Espanola, Galisteo, Lamy, Pecos, Pojoaque, Seton Village, Tesuque, and White Rock, in addition to the greater Santa Fe metro area.

"These fence styles are specific to this part of the country, and getting them right takes someone who has worked with the materials and understands the terrain," said Kevin Lopez, Owner of Evergreen Landscape Pros. "We have seen more homeowners choosing coyote and latilla fencing not just for protection, but because they want their property to feel connected to the landscape around it. That is something a crew from outside the region is going to have a hard time delivering."

Demand for regionally appropriate fencing has grown alongside a broader trend in residential construction that favors locally sourced materials and designs that reflect geographic identity. According to the National Association of Landscape Professionals, outdoor living and property boundary projects have ranked among the top service categories for landscape contractors in recent years. Evergreen Landscape Pros offers its latilla fencing and cedar and stone fencing options alongside a full suite of services that includes landscape design and installation, hardscape and stonework, patio and walkway construction, and irrigation system management.

Each fence type offered by Evergreen Landscape Pros serves a distinct functional and aesthetic purpose. Coyote fences use vertical cedar latillas, or peeled poles, lashed tightly together to create a dense barrier historically used to keep wildlife away from crops and livestock. Latilla fencing follows a similar construction method but is often configured at lower heights for decorative borders and garden enclosures. Cedar and stone fencing combines natural stone columns or pilasters with horizontal or vertical cedar planks, producing a heavier boundary structure suited to larger properties and sloped terrain.

"The material sourcing is half the job," said Kevin Lopez, Owner of Evergreen Landscape Pros. "Every latilla pole has a natural taper, and you have to select and arrange them so the fence line stays even. With stone, you are matching the color and texture to what is already on the property. It is detailed work, and cutting corners shows immediately."

The company noted that many of its fencing projects are completed in coordination with other landscape improvements on the same property. Clients frequently pair coyote fence installation with irrigation upgrades, xeriscape planting, or patio construction, allowing Evergreen Landscape Pros to manage the full scope of outdoor work under a single project timeline. The integrated approach reduces the number of separate contractors a property owner needs to hire and helps ensure that fencing materials, plantings, and hardscape elements share a cohesive design language.
